

Apprenticeships can be about more than training the next generation, according to a panel of private sector experts. They can also form the foundation of long-term business success and help instill a culture of lifelong learning.

There is no such thing as a safe job anymore. Changes in technology and even the nature of work itself mean that learning no longer ends where the career begins. Lifelong learning will be vital to professional success and when it comes to young people, we can begin this habit early.

Apprenticeships remain a vital part of training for a trade or profession today. Indeed, according to Nazrene Mannie, executive director of the Global Apprenticeship Network, a culture of apprenticeships is important to establishing long-term business success...
